

Animals are suited to their habitat

Animals live in a habitat which suits them. For example, fish have an organ called gills. Fish use gills to breathe underwater.

Fish also have fins which help them to swim.

Some types of fish live in warm water and other types of fish live in cold water. Sometimes water becomes warmer or colder because the climate changes. Fish manage to survive small changes like this as long as the changes happen slowly.

What are two adaptations fish have that make them suited to their habitat?

Fish have fins to breathe underwater and fins to help them swim.

Some people keep fish in a fish tank at home. This is not the natural habitat of the fish. How do the fish survive?

People can give them food / make sure the water is the correct temperature / give them somewhere to live / make sure they have enough oxygen

- A pigeon eats mainly seeds. Look at its beak – it is small and pointed. A pigeon can crack open (break open) seeds with this beak.

Starlings eat insects, worms and berries. A starling's beak is longer than a sparrow's beak because a starling eats bigger food. The pointed shape of the beak helps the starling to dig into the surface of the ground to get insects and worms.
