Abstract: Mental toughness is a key component of sports performance and success. Goal orientations are ways in which individuals perceive and pursue success and failure. Social emotional competence encompasses a set of skills including recognizing and managing our emotions, developing caring and concern for others, establishing positive relationships and making responsible decisions. The present study adopts a factorial design to determine the main and interaction effects of type of sports (individual and team) and gender on mental toughness, goal orientations and social emotional competence and their dimensions. This study also employs a correlational design to determine whether mental toughness and goal orientations predict the social emotional competence among boys and girls involved in individual and team sports. A non-probability purposive sampling method was used to select a sample of 401 sports players, among whom 198 (102 boys and 96 girls) were involved in individual sports and 201 (102 boys and 99 girls) were involved in team sports. There was a significant influence of type of sports (individual and team) on the dimensions of mental toughness. A significant influence of gender on dimensions of mental toughness, ego orientation and self-management was also observed. Predictors of social emotional competence have been discussed. Promoting mental toughness and task orientation among sports players will have a positive impact on their lives in sports and apart from sports making them more socially and emotionally competent.

I. Introduction

Sports Psychology is a discipline that is rooted in the ideology that psychological factors have a chief responsibility in the way performance and the factors that go behind training and performance are understood. A research study by Ilyasi & Salehian (2001) on individual and team players reported that sports players pursuing individual sports differed in terms of personality traits when compared to team players.

There exist basic differences among individual sports and team sports, the genre of sports psychology has focused on individual differences in the personality traits and the manner in which the two types of sports are pursued by sports players involved in them. Following this understanding, a comparative study between individual and team sports concluded that individual sports players scored significantly higher on conscientiousness and autonomy than team sports players, whereas, team sports players scored significantly higher on agreeableness and better interpersonal relationships than individual sports players. No significant difference was found between the two groups on neuroticism, extraversion, and openness. It can be concluded that individual and team sports players, in some aspects differ in terms of personality characteristics (Nia & Besharat, 2010).

Research among individual and team sports players has yielded significant differences with respect to motivation, coaching, and training. However, the overall enjoyment and the sense of an optimal psychological state, does not appear to have an effect on the type of sports (Parnell, 2014). In other words, type of sports has an effect on motivation coaching and training but not on the overall enjoyment and an optimal psychological state.

Mental toughness is an important ingredient of athletic success, whether sports players are in the pool, on the field, or on the court. Mental toughness is a term that people use that allows an individual to become a better sports player (such as difficult training and difficult competitive situations in games) and emerge without losing confidence. Mental toughness comprises of having the natural or developed psychological edge that enables a sports player to cope better than their opponents with the many demands (competition, training,
