I. INTRODUCTION

All forms of life live by enzymes and also produce enzymes. As a result, enzymes can be obtained from three different sources: plants, animals, and microorganisms.

Some commercial enzymes such as papain, bromelain (bromelin) ficin, and malt diastase are derived from plant sources. In the animal body, the highest accumulation of enzymes is in the glands. Stomach, spleen, pancreas, and stomach mucus are rich in several important enzymes. Some widely used enzymes such as pepsin, trypsin, α -chymotrypsin, lipase, catalase, rennin, and pancreatic enzymes are currently obtained from animal sources.

Microorganisms are becoming a favored source of industrial enzymes since the number of enzymes which can be recovered economically from plants and animals is limited. Animal enzymes, e.g., are supplied by the meat-packing industry and the size of the slaughter limits the total enzyme supply. Plants may be grown in any desired quantity if the enzyme market is precisely estimated well ahead of time. However, except in a few special cases, plants are generally utilized for other purposes rather than for enzyme production, and their growth is dependent upon geography, soil conditions, and climate. Some plant and animal enzymes of industrial importance are listed in Table I.¹

While certain plant enzymes (e.g., papain) and animal enzymes (pepsin, trypsin) will continue to have important applications, microbial enzyme production based on improving biotechnology is making significant advances.

II. SOURCES OF MICROBIAL ENZYMES

The development of fermentation methods for the production of microbial enzymes has assured an unlimited supply. For the production of industrial enzymes, microbial cells are selected from the groups of fungi, bacteria, or yeasts. Four enzymes are now produced on a large scale: protease, glucamylase, alpha-amylase, and glucose isomerase.

Microorganisms used in the production of industrial enzymes must have good biological activity. Most of microorganisms used for industrial enzyme production are aerobic strains, i.e., they require oxygen for their metabolism. The number of known
