Chapter 1

Economics in context

Learners' answers might include:

- Walking or cycling more; not owning a scooter or motor cycle; using public transport rather than a car or taxi; eating less meat (non-vegetarians); using local shops and convenience stores rather than travel to supermarket; buy more locally produced food in markets; use both sides of a piece of paper; avoid one-use disposable plastics.
- Economists could provide impartial information to assist decision-making by governments and other organisations; provide advice to a government on what goods and services should be subsidised or taxed in relation to their greenhouse gas emissions.

Activities

Activity 1.1

Learners' own answers.

Activity 1.2

Learners' discussion might include:

Alternatives to air transport, for example rail, for longer journeys; reasons why it is necessary for some people to travel by air; impact of restrictions on air transport for places and areas that are heavily dependent on international tourism; impact on producers of goods such as flowers and fresh vegetables that depend on air freight.

Activity 1.3

Learners' answers might include:

- a More goods and services such as walking aids, pre-prepared meals, healthcare, and accessible local transport will be required by older people. Housing may have to be adapted as more old people will live with younger relatives. More resources will be required for community services.
- b Production of goods and services will have to be more efficient as there will be less people of working age. The emphasis of design will need to address the needs of the aging population. Recycling and the greater use of sustainable material will be essential.
- c The Japanese government will have to make difficult decisions as it is likely to have less revenue from taxation due to less people of working age. Criteria for determining who receives government benefits will have to be reviewed along with which goods, if any, should receive a subsidy.

Think like an economist

Learners' discussion might include:

- 1 There are two possible sources of additional funding for healthcare: governments of high-income countries and non-governmental organisations (NGOs). (NGOs are private organisations that
