

D.C Machines

1 Introduction

The steam age signalled the beginning of an industrial revolution. The advantages of machines and gadgets in helping mass production and in improving the services spurred the industrial research. Thus a search for new sources of energy and novel gadgets received great attention. By the end of the 18th century the research on electric charges received a great boost with the invention of storage batteries. This enabled the research work on moving charges or currents. It was soon discovered (in 1820) that, these electric currents are also associated with magnetic field like a load stone. This led to the invention of an electromagnet. Hardly a year later the force exerted on a current carrying conductor placed in the magnetic field was invented. This can be termed as the birth of a motor. A better understanding of the inter relationship between electric and magnetic circuits was obtained with the enumeration of laws of induction by Faraday in 1831. Parallel research was contemporarily being done to invent a source of energy to recharge the batteries in the form of a d.c. source of constant amplitude (or d.c. generator). For about three decades the research on d.c. motors and d.c. generators proceeded on independent paths. During the second half of the 19th century these two paths merged. The invention of a commutator paved the way for the birth of d.c. generators and motors. These inventions generated great interest in the generation and use of electrical energy. Other useful machines like alternators, transformers and induction motors came into existence almost contemporarily. The evolution of these machines was very quick. They rapidly attained the physical configurations that are being used even today. The d.c. power system was poised for a predominant place as a preferred
