SUS1501 – Sustainability and Greed

Step 1

- a. My original answer is “I think it is morally unacceptable for humans to put their interests ahead of the rights of other species like polar bears.”

This attitude is based on the ethical belief that all living creatures have intrinsic value and need to be treated with respect and consideration. There are various reasons why it is morally unacceptable for humans to prioritize their own interests over the rights of other animals, such as polar bears:

Humans have a duty to take care of the environment and safeguard the natural world. We risk upsetting ecosystems, destroying habitats, and hastening the extinction of threatened or endangered species like polar bears by putting our own needs ahead of those of other species. This goes against our moral obligation to protect and sustain the earth for all of its people.

Complex ecological webs connect every species to one another. When one species, like polar bears, is harmed, it can have an impact on other species and the ecosystem's overall balance. By putting our own needs ahead of the rights of other species, we run the risk of upsetting these fragile relationships and harming the environment in the long run.

Polar bear extinction would have various potential implications on the broader context of climate change and the Arctic ecosystem, however these effects would be small in comparison to the bigger drivers of climate change. The disappearance of polar bears may cause changes in the population dynamics of their principal prey, seals. An rise in seal numbers may have an influence on fish stocks and other species in the Arctic food web. Killer whales and Arctic foxes could take the place of polar bears as the top predators in the Arctic environment if polar bears go extinct. Smaller species may be impacted in a cascading manner by this.

- b. My current answer is I don't think polar bears are all that important to human welfare. However, their plight is a symptom of climate change which is a big problem to future human welfare.

While polar bears may not directly impact human welfare in the same way as other issues such as healthcare or economic stability, their plight is indeed a symptom of larger environmental concerns, particularly climate change. Polar bears are an indicator
