Theory and Simulation of the Gyrotron Traveling Wave Amplifier Operating at Cyclotron Harmonics

KWO RAY CHU, ADAM T. DROBOT, HAROLD HWALING SZU, and PHILLIP SPRANGLE

Abstract—An analytical expression for the efficiency of the gyrotron traveling wave amplifier is derived for the case of nonfundamental cyclotron harmonic interaction. It scales the efficiency with respect to the modes and parameters of operation. This relation, together with a general linear dispersion relation, also derived in the present paper, gives the characteristics and optimum operation conditions of the gyrotron traveling wave amplifier.

I. INTRODUCTION

AN INTERESTING electromagnetic radiation mechanism [1]–[3] known as the electron cyclotron maser has been the subject of intense research activities in recent years. This mechanism has been the basis for a new class of microwave devices called gyrotrons capable of generating microwaves at unprecedented power levels at millimeter and submillimeter wavelengths. A detailed description of the cyclotron maser mechanism is given in [4] and brief summaries of gyrotron theories and experiments, together with lists of references, can be found in recent review papers [5]–[7].

In the present study, we will concentrate on a particular type of gyrotrons—the gyrotron traveling wave amplifier

(gyro-TWA). The cyclotron maser instability and its wide-band amplification capability was demonstrated experimentally by Granatstein et al. [8] on an intense relativistic electron beam. The basic physical processes taking place in a gyro-TWA have been analyzed in recent linear and nonlinear theories [4], [9]–[16]. In the actual operation of a gyro-TWA, the beam-to-wave energy conversion efficiency is one of the most important considerations. References [12]–[14] contain detailed studies of the saturation mechanisms and calculations of efficiency for the operation at the fundamental cyclotron harmonic. However, the scaling of the efficiency with respect to the various modes and parameters of operation has not been considered in any detail, nor has the operation at the nonfundamental cyclotron harmonics. The nonfundamental harmonic operation is of great importance for the amplification of submillimeter waves if unrealistically high magnetic fields ( $>100$  kG) are to be avoided. In anticipation of the growing experimental effort aimed at the generation of submillimeter waves, our main purpose in the present study is to derive a general analytical expression for the operating efficiency.

II. DERIVATION OF A GENERAL DISPERSION RELATION

The typical configuration of a gyro-TWA consists of an annular electron beam propagating inside a waveguide of
