

ACTIVITY 5

CHAPTER 5: CASH AND ACCRUAL BASIS

1. Describe cash basis and accrual basis of accounting.
 - Cash basis accounting is the recognition of cash only when received and not when earned. Income from credit accounts is not included in cash basis accounting until in the businesses account. The accounting for expenses paid is when the business pays them, not when incurred.
 - The accrual basis of accounting is the concept of recording revenues when earned and expenses as incurred. The use of this approach also impacts the balance sheet, where receivables or payables may be recorded even in the absence of an associated cash receipt or cash payment, respectively. The accrual basis of accounting is advocated under both generally accepted accounting principles (GAAP) and international financial reporting standards (IFRS).

2. Compare and contrast cash and accrual basis of accounting.
 - Cash basis accounting records revenue and expenses when actual payments are received or disbursed. It doesn't account for either when the transactions that create them occur. On the other hand, accrual accounting records revenue and expenses when those transactions occur and before any money is received or paid out.

3. Apply cash basis in accounting for business transactions.

In order to demonstrate, an illustration of a certain business transaction will be provided.

To record sales on account.

Account receivable.	XX
Sales	XX

To record receipt of note from sales on account.

Note receivable.	XX
Sales.	XX

To record sales return from a customer.
