When Charles Darwin first visited the Galapagos Islands, he was struck by the similarities between the species of the islands and the species of the continent, but noted the differences in the species of the islands. Darwin's observations led to the theory of evolution.

Evolution is the process by which organisms change over time. It is the result of natural selection, which is the process by which organisms with traits that are better suited to their environment survive and reproduce, while those with less favorable traits do not. Over time, this process leads to the development of new species.

In 1859, Darwin published his book "On the Origin of Species," which laid out his theory of evolution. He argued that all life on Earth has descended from a common ancestor, and that the diversity of life is the result of natural selection. His theory was revolutionary at the time, and it has since become the foundation of modern biology.

The theory of evolution has been supported by a wide range of evidence, including fossil records, comparative anatomy, and molecular biology. It has also been used to explain the diversity of life on Earth, and the relationships between different species.
