shocking reports suggest that 74% of all employees have no emergency savings and are entirely dependent on their paycheck. In fact, the situation is so bad that only 40% of people can cover an emergency expenditure of 1,000 without turning to a bank or their credit card. It's time to put an end to that vicious cycle. Financial independence and freedom from debt do not require a ton of rigorous discipline or incredible wealth. It's simply a matter of reassessing your priorities and getting a realistic view of how much you're actually spending per month. Chances are that you're blowing cash you haven't earned. Credit cards and other financial instruments create a false sense of security, and at the end of the day, you'll have to pay the money plus the interest rates back. America is experiencing a debt crisis, and our consumerist society is largely to blame. If you take a minute to assess some of your latest purchases, you'll probably find that you're spending a ton of cash on things you don't need. So what's the secret to rectifying such impulsive behaviors and reclaiming your financial wellbeing? Major change is difficult to stick to. Starting with baby steps on the other hand can produce tremendous results that will last years, if not a lifetime. In SimpleCents Guide to Manage Your Money, you will discover:
