Short Answer

16. directional selection
17. Directional selection occurs when one extreme phenotype is favored by natural selection.
18. The graph would shift back toward the left. The mean value of the number of spines would shift toward plants with lower numbers of spines.
19. 110
20. The peccaries are eating more cacti with fewer spines, so cacti with a greater number of spines are being selected for.
21. The five mass extinction events in the fossil record.
22. Mass extinctions occur as a result of global catastrophes. These events result in extinction rates that are much higher than the normal background extinction rate. Many species become extinct during these global events.
23. The oldest mass extinction event occurred about 480 million years ago. The next event occurred about 400 million years ago. The next two occurred about 250 million years ago and 214 million years ago. The last occurred about 56 million years ago. (Allow estimates close to these numbers, because the graph is imprecise.)
24. the theory of punctuated equilibrium
25. Mass extinctions are the result of global catastrophes, during which a large portion of the species on Earth become extinct. These events open up large portions of Earth's land and/or marine environments. Organisms that survive the mass extinction event may undergo a rapid burst of evolution and diversify to fill the open environments. Global diversity often changes dramatically after a mass extinction event.
