
Better than Orgasm: Sex, Authenticity and Intimacy in the New Women's Movement in Norway

Tone Hellesund

ABSTRACT

Authenticity and intimacy have become key expectations in contemporary romantic relationships. At the same time, it is taken for granted that sex forms a part of such relationships. This article explores how the relationship between sex, authenticity and intimacy was written about and negotiated in the Norwegian community of lesbian radical feminists in the 1970s and 1980s. The construction of male sexuality as fundamentally and inherently different from female sexuality in the periodicals of the lesbian movement made thinking and writing about women's sexual desire and genital sex difficult. This article further argues that the concept of genital sex potentially conflicted with the notions of authenticity and intimacy pursued by the lesbian radical feminist community. While authenticity and intimacy were constructed as preferable companions to sex in the New Left and in large parts of the women's movement, the Norwegian lesbian radical feminists often constructed authenticity and intimacy in opposition to genital sex.

In 1975, a separatist Women's House was opened in Oslo, Norway, and the newly founded lesbian organisation, Lesbisk Bevegelse (Lesbian movement), became one of its active groups. Visitors to the Women's House recounted scandalous tales of self-inspection circles where women examined their own and other people's vulvas to get to know their bodies better. Vulvas were also commonly used as decorative motifs within the movement. Most likely the tales exaggerated the frequency of the self-inspection circles, but undoubtedly vaginal imagery was far more visible there than in most other places in society. Although vulvas were all over the place, this investigation will show that the movement found genital sex both problematic and difficult to talk about.

While this article originally set out to document and analyse the views on sex and sexuality found in the lesbian radical feminist movement in Norway, it has ultimately taken the form of a more general analysis of the transformations of intimacy in late modernity, particularly of the new centrality of authenticity and intimacy.¹ I argue that this is one of several reasons why there is an absence of writing on female sex and sexuality in the various periodicals associated with the Norwegian movement. Theorists describing the transformations of intimacies since the 1960s have claimed that there is a link between the New Women's Movement and the development of new ideals and practices of family life and personal relationships, pointing to the
