

Newton's Laws of Motion

1. FORCE

A pull or push which changes or tends to change the state of rest or of uniform motion or direction of motion of any object is called force. Force is the interaction between the object and the source (providing the pull or push). It is a vector quantity.

Effect of resultant force :

- may change only speed
- may change only direction of motion.
- may change both the speed and direction of motion.
- may change size and shape of a body

unit of force : newton and $\frac{\text{kg}\cdot\text{m}}{\text{s}^2}$ (MKS System)

dyne and $\frac{\text{g}\cdot\text{cm}}{\text{s}^2}$ (CGS System)

1 newton = 10^5 dyne

Kilogram force (kgf)

The force with which earth attracts a 1 kg body towards its centre is called kilogram force, thus

$$\text{kgf} = \frac{\text{Force in newton}}{g}$$

Dimensional Formula of force : $[MLT^{-2}]$

For full information of force we require

- Magnitude of force
- direction of force
- point of application of the force

1.1 Electromagnetic Force

Force exerted by one particle on the other because of the electric charge on the particles is called electromagnetic force.

Following are the main characteristics of electromagnetic force

- These can be attractive or repulsive
- These are long range forces
- These depend on the nature of medium between the charged particles.
- All macroscopic force (except gravitational) which we experience as push or pull or by contact are electromagnetic, i.e., tension in a rope, the force of friction, normal reaction, muscular force, and force experienced by a deformed spring are electromagnetic forces. These are manifestations of the electromagnetic attractions or repulsions between atoms/molecules.
