Abstract

This article reports on an analysis and comparison of three South African Grade 9 (13-14 years), Natural Sciences textbooks for the representation of nature of science. The analysis was framed by an analytical tool developed and validated by Abd-El-Khalick and a team of researchers in a large scale study on the high school textbooks in the United States. The three textbooks were scored on targeted nature of science aspects on a scale of -3 to +3, that reflected the explicitness with which these aspects were addressed. The textbooks are compliant with the South African school science curriculum and widely used at schools throughout South Africa. The analysis revealed that the textbooks poorly depict nature of science, and in particular there was scant attention given to the social dimension of science, science versus pseudoscience and the 'myth of the scientific method'. The findings of this study are incommensurate with the strong emphasis in a reformed school science curriculum that underlies the need for learners to understand the scientific enterprise, and how scientific knowledge develops. Textbooks are considered to play a pivotal role in driving such reform, especially in a climate where teachers reportedly have a limited capacity to design curriculum material. In view of this, the findings of this research reinforce the need for a review on the mandate given to textbook publishers and writers so that a stronger focus be placed on the development of materials that better represent the tenets of nature of science.
