Male Reproductive Anatomy

Objectives

- 1) To learn the anatomical structures of the male reproductive tracts of farm animals.
- 2) To learn the functional significance of the anatomical parts of the male reproductive tract.
- 3) To learn how the different anatomical parts of the reproductive tract function as a unit from the production of sperm to its eventual ejaculation from the penis in farm animals.

The male reproductive organs consist of: a) paired testes, b) epididymides, c) efferent ducts, d) ampullae (absent in some species), e) paired seminal vesicles, f) prostate gland, g) paired bulbo-urethral (Cowper's) glands, and h) penis.

The seminal vesicles, prostate, and bulbo-urethral glands discharge secretions into the pelvic urethra, which mix with spermatozoa and fluids secreted by the testes, epididymides, and vas deferens, and for this reason they are often termed the accessory sex glands.

Please refer to "Pathways to Parturition and Pregnancy" for the figures cited in this review.

I. SCROTUM

The scrotum is present in all domestic animals and is an out-pouching of skin from the abdominal region and encloses the testes. By the last third of gestation in domestic animals, the testes are normally located in the scrotum (Figures 3-3, 3-4, 3-5, 3-6, 3-7, 3-8). Failure of the testes to descend into the scrotum results in a condition known as cryptorchidism (Figure 4-8). If both testes fail to descend (bilateral cryptorchidism) it results in sterility. A unilateral cryptorchid has a single descended testis; they are fertile but there is a tendency for this condition to be inherited. Males possessing this trait should not be used for breeding.

The scrotum consists of five layers (Figures 3-2, 3-14, 3-25) from outside to inside as follows:

- 1) An outer layer, the skin or epidermis, is heavily populated with sweat glands to assist in maintaining proper testicular temperature.
- 2) The tunica dartos consists of fibro-elastic tissue and smooth muscle, which is connected closely with the tunica vaginalis at the bottom of the scrotum. The scrotum consists of two pouches, which contain a testicle. The tunica dartos acts as a thermoregulator by contracting to draw the testes close to the abdomen when cold and relaxing when the testes are warm.
- 3) The stratum subdarticum is a loosely woven layer of connective tissue between the tunica dartos and tunica vaginalis-parietal layer. This tissue allows the testes extraordinarily free mobility in an upward and downward direction.
- 4) The tunica vaginalis-parietal layer (lines the scrotum) is continuous with the peritoneum.
- 5) The tunica vaginalis-visceral layer (covers the testis) is continuous with the peritoneum.
 - A. BULL - The scrotum is long and pendulous and has a well-marked neck when not contracted. It is covered with short hairs with four (sometimes two) rudimentary teats in front of it.
 - B. RAM - The scrotum possesses the same general characteristics as the bull.
 - C. BOAR - The scrotum is situated only a short distance from the anus and is less distinctly separated from the surrounding parts than in other animals (less saccular).
 - D. STALLION - The scrotum is globular in form but is often asymmetrical because of the larger size of one testicle, usually the left one. The scrotum is not located as far forward as in the bull.
 - E. DOG - The scrotum is similar to the boar and located in the same general area.
 - F. CAT - The scrotum is located between the anus and the penis unlike the other animals studied.

II. TESTIS (Plural TESTES)

The paired organs are usually ovoid or walnut shaped. They are the primary organs of reproduction in the male. The testes are fixed in the sack of the tunica vaginalis. They consist of a series of distinct duct systems
