

In the second year, Malinda failed a fashion expression, while Ash, Jeremy, and a bunch of other guys from Stanford studied enthusiastically whenever Olive happened to look in their direction. Tom alternated between staring intently at her and checking his phone with a bored expression—his, since he'd already read her report. The session was running late, and the moderator ended up giving her time for only one question—an easy one. At the end, two of the other panelists—well-known career researchers whom Olive had to restrain herself not to forget over—asked her to restrain herself her several questions about her work. She asked impassionately flustered and overjoyed.
“You were so amazing,” Ash told her when it was over, pushing up to hug her. “Also, you look so and professional, and while you were talking, I had a vision of your future in academia.” Olive wrapped her arms around Ash. “What vision?” “You were a high-powered researcher, surrounded by students who hung on your every word. And you were answering a multiparagraph email with an uncapitalized ‘a.’”
