

MATHEMATICAL MODELING: HARVEY WEINBERG*

Mathematical modeling is a process that involves first creating a mathematical model of a real-world situation and then using the model to solve a problem. The process is iterative and often involves revising the model as more information is gathered.

THE MODELING PROCESS

Mathematical modeling is a process that involves first creating a mathematical model of a real-world situation and then using the model to solve a problem. The process is iterative and often involves revising the model as more information is gathered. The model is used to make predictions and to test these predictions against actual data. If the model does not accurately predict the data, the model is revised and the process is repeated.

The modeling process is often used in science, engineering, and business. For example, a scientist might use a mathematical model to predict the behavior of a system. An engineer might use a mathematical model to design a new product. A business might use a mathematical model to analyze market trends.
