Attracting Birds in the Texas Hill Country W. Rufus Stephens, Jan Wrede, 2016-12-22 After years of working with landowners land managers naturalists county officials and others about wildlife management and land stewardship for birds in the Texas Hill Country biologist Rufus Stephens and educator Jan Wrede teamed up to write a practical guidebook on how to improve habitat for birds on both small and large properties throughout the Hill Country. Because each bird species has specific needs for cover, food, water, nesting, and rearing their young, the book is organized by Hill Country habitat types: wooded slopes and savannas, grasslands, rivers and creeks, canyons, seeps and springs, tanks and ponds, plus residential backyards. Each chapter contains an in-depth discussion of common problems and possible solutions for developing optimum habitat. The book showcases 107 species in their habitats with color photographs and a short descriptive account of how to know the bird and care for its habitat. Three additional chapters on predator control, deer management, and cedar management offer detailed information on these special issues that impact the presence of birds throughout the region. As a comprehensive guide to habitat assessment, identification of birds and the habitats they use, plus stewardship practices that will benefit these birds, Attracting Birds in the Texas Hill Country offers landowners the ideal how-to manual for writing an effective Wildlife Tax Valuation plan. By helping readers recognize and evaluate habitat health and then use appropriate habitat enhancement practices, the authors hope to inspire and enable widespread and effective bird conservation in the Texas Hill Country. And as bird populations flourish, so do the populations of other wildlife.

The Influence of Habitat Features on Grassland Birds Nesting in the Prairie Pothole Region of North Dakota, David Joseph Horn, 2000. Results of habitat fragmentation studies on grassland and wetland birds are not consistent. Some studies have found positive relationships among abundance, nest success, field size, and distance to edges, whereas others have found no relationship. One reason for differing results may be the landscape composition in which the study took place. I examined how landscape composition influenced relations among 1) occurrence and abundance of grassland songbirds and field size, and 2) nest success of ducks, field size, and edges. I also investigated the effects of mowing on grassland songbirds and how landscape features such as amount of perennial grassland and predator community composition influenced the nest success of ducks in fields. The study took place in the Prairie Pothole Region of central North Dakota during the 1996-1997 breeding seasons. Two types of 6.4 x 6.4 km study areas were selected based on the amount of perennial grassland they contained: 15% and 51%. The remaining portion of the study areas was primarily cropland and wetland.

Monitoring Bird Populations in Small Geographic Areas, 2006. Numerous methods exist for monitoring bird populations, and there is a large literature describing them. There are few resources, however, that provide comprehensive advice on every step of organizing and carrying out a survey, from the early stages of planning to final use of the data. Even fewer resources are designed to meet the needs of a wide variety of potential users, from amateurs interested in change of bird life in a local study preserve to professionals testing hypotheses on the response of birds to habitat management. Although much of the advice should be the same for every monitoring program, whether survey objectives are very modest or rigorously scientific, samples must be sufficiently numerous and well distributed to provide meaningful results, and the survey should be well designed to ensure that the money and effort going into it are not wasted. This document is intended to be a complete resource for anyone planning to organize monitoring of noncolonial landbirds within a relatively small geographic area e g from the size of a woodlot to a large park The first of its two parts provides background explaining the importance of good study design and gives specific advice on all aspects of project planning and execution of high quality data collection for the purpose of hypothesis testing The second part is self contained and nontechnical and describes complete plans for a site specific checklist survey suitable for addressing monitoring questions frequently asked by amateurs and for involvement of volunteers in data collection Throughout are references to additional resources from background literature to sources of existing survey protocols analysis software and tools for archiving data
