Microkernel systems are preferred today over other architectures because they are simpler than all other systems. The individual functions, including services, are placed in separate processes of the kernel, making it easier to update or remove them. The advantages of microkernel architecture include reduced overhead, increased reliability, and better security.

Microkernel systems have a smaller footprint than other architectures, as they only require the OS processes that are needed. This makes them a good choice for embedded systems, as they can be easily adapted to a specific hardware platform.
