

Chi-Square Test

The chi-square test is the appropriate test through the tested data is qualitative. Designed for categorical data, the usual null hypothesis is $H_0: \mu = \mu_0$. It is based on the observed and expected relative frequencies, which is a way of testing whether the observed μ is different or not. In other words, we can use chi-square to determine if the given data significantly differs from the expected distribution. It is used to test whether the observed and expected frequencies are significantly different or not. Thus, the assumption of significance test is that the observed and expected frequencies are not significantly different. The test is used to compare the observed and expected frequencies. It is used to test whether the observed and expected frequencies are significantly different or not.

Example 1: A chi-square test of independence

The chi-square test is used to determine the significance of a relationship between two variables. It is used to judge whether people have different preferences for different products with respect to their preferences. Suppose H_0 is the null hypothesis. H_1 is the alternative hypothesis. The test is used to determine whether the observed and expected frequencies are significantly different or not. The test is used to determine whether the observed and expected frequencies are significantly different or not. The test is used to determine whether the observed and expected frequencies are significantly different or not.
