

Dissoi logoi

Dissoi logoi ('Twofold Arguments') is the title scholars apply to a short anonymous collection of arguments for and against various theses. The work, in Greek, is (questionably) dated around 400 BC, and regarded as an interesting, if second-rank, product of the Sophistic age.

The opening sentence of Dissoi logoi announces 'twofold arguments' about good and bad: one set to show that good and bad are the same, another to show they are different. Chapters 2–4 follow the same pattern for the opposites seemly and shameful, just and unjust, true and false, respectively. Chapters 5–7 argue for and against a thesis, respectively: 'The demented and the sane, the wise and the ignorant, both do and say the same things', 'Wisdom and virtue cannot be taught or learned' and 'Public offices should be assigned by lot'. Chapter 8 argues positively for the idea that a good speaker will know everything. Chapter 9 recommends the art of memorisation, but the manuscripts break off leaving both chapter and treatise incomplete.

This is a mere summary of the document. Nothing can be said with certainty about it. Not only its author, but its text, date, overall purpose and intellectual affiliations remain matters for scholarly speculation. Speculation has run riot.

To begin with the text: its Doric dialect is marred by intrusions of Attic and some Ionic forms. Is this due to the tendency of scribes to normalise the texts they copy? To a non-Doric speaker writing for a Doric-speaking audience? Or did a Doric author rewrite an earlier text? Imperfect Doric betrays numerous forgeries ascribed to early Pythagoreans but produced long after 400 BC. The antique feel to the text could be misleading.

What of the standard dating? This rests largely on a mention of the Peloponnesian War (431–404 BC) as the most recent of a series of notable wars going back, via the Persian and Trojan Wars, to the battle of the gods and giants. Was there a comparable war between 404 BC and Rome's
