Abstract

This work explores the area of global interdependences and the global context. In particular it deals with interdependences that seem to be absent from current literature but could be of great significance to identify the biggest challenges that the economy and the energy sector will have to face in the next two or three decades. In that sense, several issues are addressed: the dynamics of economic growth and its future; the relation between these dynamics and the foreseeable importance that urban poverty is to have at a global scale; the lack and inadequacy of information to approach crucial interdependences; and the need for a change in institutions and thinking habits to analyze the future. The approach focuses on the complex relationships that link urbanization, development phases, and technological changes dependent on products with shorter life cycles, discussing the impact of this kind of process over the genesis of urban poverty and over the structural modifications of economy. At the same time, a view on how these interdependences will become a serious and increasingly complex challenge for the energy sector and long term global sustainability is presented. The author also emphasizes the fact that these interdependences will become a serious and increasingly complex challenge that the energy sector will have to face if long term sustainability is to be attained.

1. Introduction

The main purpose of this research is to characterize the dynamics of economic growth from a long-term evolutionary approach linking urbanization processes and technological change. It aims to explore the problem of the growing interdependences affecting real processes of economic growth, their dynamics—which change over time and space, their links with other aspects such as the genesis of poverty and marginality in urban areas and the challenges derived from such dynamics into the future, also in relation to energy. The text has been divided into sections in order to provide a sequenced explanation of the complex nature of these links and because of the need for a comprehensive approach to explain as well as to understand the problem.

The main hypotheses, then, are formulated in Section 2. They are an attempt at describing, from a heterodox and evolutionary perspective, the genesis of the dual society or, in other words, the genesis of poverty coexisting with opulence in urban areas. What makes this approach original is the evolutionary perspective from which urbanization and technological change processes are analyzed as specific and structural factors explaining both the dynamics and changing nature of the economic activity, as well as its impacts on economic growth and the factors that limit income distribution. These factors are accounted for as a consequence of supply price formation and of large-scale rural-urban migration processes, which also include intergenerational factors when considered in the long term.

Alongside the hypotheses mentioned above, Section 3 explores foreseen trends for urban population growth at the regional and global levels. Two main aspects are considered: a) urban population growth in Asia and Africa will predominate in the urbanization process for the next two decades; b) that will imply that, out of the total increase foreseen for world population, 97% will correspond to urban population, which would indicate the proximity of a limit to the global urbanization process and a decrease in absolute terms in the number of total rural population.

Such projections have several consequences, but the most important ones are related to the fact that urbanization will no longer have a role as the drive for future growth, as was the case over more than two centuries,
