The Rabies Epidemic in Trinidad of 1929 to 1937: An Evaluation with a Geographic Information System

Kamuel Mangrum, MBBS, MPH, FRPH, MBA; Ron Mahabir, BSc, MSc

From the University of the West Indies, St. Augustine, Trinidad and Tobago.

Background.—Rabies, although not prominent among current infectious diseases, continues to afflict humans with as many as 55,000 deaths annually. The case fatality rate remains the highest among infectious diseases, and medical treatments have proven ineffective.

Objective.—This study analyzes the rabies epidemics of 1929 to 1937 in Trinidad from a geographic perspective, using Geographic Information Systems (GIS) software as an analytical tool.

Setting.—A small island developing country at a time when infectious diseases were rampant.

Methods.—A review of the literature was undertaken, and data were collected on the occurrence of disease in both animal and human populations and mapped using GIS software. Several factors identified in the literature were further explored such as land use/land cover, rainfall and magnetic declination.

Results.—The first rabies epidemic of 1929 to 1937 in Trinidad was migratory and seasonal, shifting to new locations along a definite path. The pattern of spread appears to be spatially linked to land use/land cover. The epidemic continues to present many unexplained peculiarities.

Conclusions.—Despite the fact that this epidemic occurred almost 7 decades ago, the application of new tools available for public health use can create new knowledge and understanding of events. We showed that the spatial distribution of the disease followed a distinct pathway possible due to the use of anthropogenic capabilities of bats.

Key words: rabies, GIS, epidemics.

Introduction

High mortality rates have been associated with epizootics. Rabies, one of the oldest recognized zoonotic diseases, is caused by ribonucleic acid (RNA) viruses in the family Rhabdoviridae genus Lyssavirus, transmitted through the bite of an infected mammal in which the virus is present in the saliva.^{1–4} However, this is not the only mode of transmission, as rabies can be acquired with infected animal-derived tissue in cases inhabited by rabid bats and in laboratory accidents.^{5–7} Transmission is also possible by handling and skinning of infected carcasses.^{8–9} Human-to-human transmission other than by corneal transplantation has not been well documented,¹⁰ although, in 2004, rabies was identified as the cause of death among 4 patients who were recipients of organs and a vascular graft.¹¹ A potential risk also exists from contact with infected body fluids.¹² The only epidemic of rabies to have occurred on the island of Trinidad was in 1929 to 1937. In that epidemic, bats, for the first time, were identified as the mode of transmission. Bats are a major reservoir for variants of rabies virus and transmit the disease through biting, which can sometimes go unrecognized.^{13–15} Support for the effectiveness of this mode of transmission is derived from laboratory data with silver-haired bats (Lasiurus cinereus naevius) and eastern pipistrelles (Pipistrellus hesperus) that demonstrated a higher likelihood of infection after superficial inoculation into cuts of epidermal origin.¹⁶ Infection is primarily of the central nervous system (CNS), leading to an acute progressive encephalomyelitis in which most cases are fatal.

The annual number of deaths worldwide caused by rabies is estimated to be 55,000, mostly in rural areas of Africa and Asia, while the annual estimated cost of rabies is $583.5 million (USD).¹⁷ Although mortality
