1 General labour market and litigation trends

The Pakistani labour market's litigation matters pertain mainly to blue-collar issues, including termination, unfair dismissal, discrimination, as well as disputes involving trade unions and workers' rights organisations. With the influx of multinational companies and NGOs in the region during the past two decades, we have seen courts give much more importance to what is agreed between the employer and the employee in the employment agreement.

The most recent case which confirms the unwillingness of the courts to interfere with an employment agreement's terms is Muhammad Rasheed vs. H. Obashi Chief (Representation) Of Toyota Tsusho Corporation, where a grievance petition was dismissed on the basis that the appellant had already agreed in writing to the terms of the appointment letter, stating that the employee could be terminated by giving three months' notice, or three months' gross salary in lieu thereof. Also the fact that there were only seven (hence fewer than 20 employees) at the workplace, the operation of S.33 & 47—Industrial and Commercial Employment (Standing Orders) Ordinance (VI of 1968), S.1 (4)(a) & S.O.12 which pertain to termination of service, was excluded.

In Sbaikat Ali vs. Chief Executive PESCO, the question of legal and economic justice in labour laws arose with regard to the operation of S.O.13 (3)—Khyber Pakhtunkhwa Industrial Relations Act (XVI of 2010), S.37. The matter involved the withholding of back benefits, and it was argued that such an action amounted to discrimination. The court upheld this view, stating that the Industrial Relations Act, 2010 was basically a beneficial legislation, which provided for protection of rights of labour classes; its object amongst others was to ameliorate the conditions of workers; such legislation had to be construed liberally and beneficially. It was also stated that a narrow interpretation of the meaning and metaphor of the Industrial Relations Act, 2010 would defeat the manifest objective of legislation, hence time-barred de novo proceedings and withholding of back benefits were held to be illegal and unlawful, and an appeal was allowed on this basis. This is a positive trend as far as workers' rights are concerned and the fact that the weaker party was the "worker" in this regard meant their rights had to be balanced against the legal arguments by the state entity that was the employer.

2015 has been the year when constitutional rights were raised with regard to labour matters. In the case of SARKHAWAT vs. FEDERATION OF PAKISTAN through Secretary, Ministry of Law and Justice and Parliamentary Affairs, the appellant sought to invoke S. 5—Constitution of Pakistan, Arts.199, 141 & Item No.32 of the Fourth Schedule in a constitutional petition involving re-employment after retrenchment of disabled persons. The petitioners sought to contend that benefit of the 2% quota allocated to disabled persons in view of the provisions of the Disabled Persons (Employment and Rehabilitation) Ordinance, 1961 that was promulgated to rehabilitate disabled persons through employment. The court held that the appeal be allowed because this is a type of beneficial legislation seeking to compel public and private sector organisations to maintain quotas for employing special/disabled persons. Even though this Ordinance could not be strictly called a law for workmen only, its real purpose was to provide employment to disabled persons. The court agreed that if the employees' termination was on the ground of retrenchment, had not left any stigma on their service record and if the law entitled them to be retained in employment on certain conditions, and they fulfilled the requisite criteria, their services could not be retrenched. Based on this, the High Court directed the authorities to first apply the quota under the said Ordinance to the petitioner's case and, after maintaining the 2% quota in case petitioners' services remained protected, the petitioners should be re-employed. This judgment seems like a welcome change, with the judges taking the initiative to protect the rights of disabled persons.

Most of the recent cases involving labour disputes also centre on the status of a workman, that is, to determine the real status of a worker, by delving into questions such as:

- whether he was an employee of an establishment or a contractor (the criteria was whether the establishment had administrative control over the worker);
- whether the worker was based at the establishment for the work done;
- whether the establishment had the power to reinstate and dismiss the worker;
