

Are you following me so far? Let me describe these terms once again but in plain English:

- ✓ Advertised distance: How far the destination is away for your neighbor.
- ✓ Feasible distance: The total distance to the destination.

The best path to the destination is called the successor!

The successor will be copied from the topology table to the routing table.

With EIGRP however it's possible to have a backup path which we call the feasible successor. How do we find out if we have a feasible successor? Let's find out:

In the example above we have a couple of routers running EIGRP; we are sitting on the router without a name on the left side and would like to know two things:

- ✓ Which path is the successor (the best path)?
- ✓ Do we have any feasible successors? (backup paths)
